Once upon a time, there was this king who wanted to do good things for the people. Every day he would ride around in his carriage and give out goodies to all of the nice people. But one day, the people got tired of this. They gathered together to stop him from doing anymore giving away. He tried to explain he only wanted the best for them, but nobody listened. The king was very sad and all alone, and then he met a man that was very smart. Together they came up with a plan to trick the people into thinking he's giving away what was meant for them.

Each day the king would be disguised as a different person giving out things to people. The king then tried to find out good among the people and rewarded them. This made the people happy and they were thankful. Eventually, everyone became nice because of this plan until one day a man came to the king complaining he did not receive anything from him that day. The king was surprised and asked if he had been good, but there was no answer. So, the king told everyone again, good things come to those who are good.
